Abstract

The article mainly focuses on explaining moderate relativism and how it differs from other forms of epistemic relativism. It also aims to present arguments defending moderate relativism. To start, the article highlights the novelty and significance of the subject matter by reviewing the research background. It then proceeds to present the various types of relativism and provides a summary of epistemological relativism. The article argues that relativism is opposed to "absolutism," but not necessarily to objectivism, subjectivism, or realism. Furthermore, it examines the moderating factors that distinguish moderate relativism from extreme relativism and absolutism. The article concludes by presenting arguments in support of moderate relativism as a middle ground between these two extremes.

Keywords: epistemic relativism; extreme relativism; absolutism; objectivism; moderate epistemic relativism
